The Glass Hall, as this project is known, is the former courtyard of the old Portugese synagogue, now covered with glass. The interior space is one of the most popular locations in The Hague for presentations, debates, diners, receptions and concerts. Besides the hall is also popular as wedding location. In June 2004 Octatube has started with the installation of this special covered exterior space, leaving the 18th century synagogue untouched.

The high level of transparency of the roof and the facades is achieved by a stainless steel tensile structure in combination with double glass units. The glass fixation is realised by means of stainless steel Quattro nodes. Along the longitudinal facades a bespoke horizontal edge detail has been introduced to bridge the gap between the glass roof and the existing surrounding walls. By situating the cuboid shape above the synagogue entrance, the old building is visually embraced.
